

Evaluating Imputation Methods

Missing data are a ubiquitous challenge in data analysis, and numerous imputation methods have been developed to address this issue. However, selecting an appropriate method and applying it correctly remain difficult tasks, particularly when the goal is to preserve the original distribution and underlying structure of the data. This presentation discusses approaches to evaluating and comparing imputation methods, with a particular focus on benchmarking frameworks.